In all probability the element of curiosity. which has so large a place in the American mind, will prompt a large patronage of the play; and possibly the public, having become somewhat accustomed to the thought, will be less prejudiced than when the subjest was first mooted; although sometimes in mind, it will be more the less shameful to have so sacred a theme dragged by miscellaneous hands over the boards of an extemporized theatre.

Time was when sacred plays were the staple form of theatrical entertainments. Miracle-plays and the like were produced in churches and convents, in the halls of castles and palaces. That time succeeded the ancient and immediately preceded the modern style of theatricals. But it has long been set aside as irreverent, and now is regarded as blasphemous.

It is maintained by those who are opposed to the theatre in general that the enactment of the "Passion Play" at Ober-Ammergau favors religious thought. But observers are careful to point out the facts, that it is there played only one season in a decade of years in fulfillment of a vow made by the ancestors of the Bavarian peasants; that the motive is religious and not mercenary; and that those who take part in it cannot be induced, for any money consideration, to repeat the performance elsewhere.

The episode of the man swallowed by the quicksands of Britiany is told with great power and effect by Victor Hago in "Les Miserables." That kind of death is horrible certainly in the idea, if not in the eality. A casualty, of shorter dura ion but equally terrible in its results, has just occurred at Cincinnati, in the yard of a leather establishment, which for some years had been dumping its refuse tan bark into a pond, until it had risen to the top and appeared quite solid. A flower or some other object attracting a boy who was passing, he walked upon the bark. But he had scarcely placed his feet on it before he sank, and before assistance was rendered he had disappeared and was suffocated.
